About the theme

Two-Day National Conference on: "Integration, Development and Sustainability: Economy, Polity, Religion, Culture and Caste in Indian Society"

Theme of the Conference

Integration- a sense of unity within a society is contingent upon its members' consciousness of a shared identity; this signifies that notwithstanding our diverse linguistic backgrounds, cultural backgrounds, and religious affiliations, we acknowledge that we are all one. A spirit, and not merely a sense of national identity, unites individuals of diverse dialects and beliefs to pursue a common goal. Social integration is strengthened through the conduct and resolve of its constituents. The social, economic, and political integration an individual attains imparts hues to the facets of their societal experiences. Greater emphasis must be placed on social integration, the process by which every member of society is assimilated into its social structure. A greater degree of social assimilation unites diverse ethnic groups, regardless of language, caste, or creed, contributing to a closer social distance between groups and more consistent values and practices. Eliminating segregation it grants access to every aspect of community life. Social integration is, for the most part, a structured and dynamic process in which every member participates in dialogue to establish and sustain harmonious social relations. It emphasizes the necessity of maintaining conditions of social disintegration, exclusion, polarization, and social fragmentation in order to achieve a secure, stable, and equitable society, as well as broadening and fortifying conditions of social integration in order to foster harmonious social relationships characterized by collaboration, coexistence, and unity.

In light of the dynamic environmental, social, and economic requirements, perspectives on sustainability are subject to variation. Since then, Indian society has been predicated on the notion of independence. The eternal focus of traditional Indian wisdom has been the welfare of humanity and an inseparable, harmonious connection with the natural world. Sustainability was an intrinsic rather than an externally adopted concept, as it was ingrained in the populace via various traditions, customs, and beliefs that constituted the foundation of the Indian way of life. It was interpreted as an attitude and required personal adjustment. It has been customary for centuries to demonstrate reverence for natural resources, preserve them, and contribute to their well-being in any way feasible to ensure that posterity may benefit from them in the same manner we do.

Therefore, sustainability necessitates the preservation of culture and natural resources via a variety of beliefs, traditions, and customs. The harmony between man and nature is fundamental to the ethos and tradition of India. This not only Indian tradition, religion, and culture but also the Indian way of life. Indian households and cultures incorporate this mentality and tradition of sustainability into their way of life and culture in various ways. In Indian society, social integration and sustainability encounter obstacles across multiple tiers, including but not limited to the economy, politics, culture, religion, and caste. Throughout the decades, there have been numerous vicissitudes in the economy and government, and religion, culture, and caste have all undergone periods of change and adaptation. The purpose of this conference is to examine, deliberate, and discuss the patterns and trends of transitions and challenges that arise due to the evolution of economic policies, political ideologies, and the ideals and ideologies encapsulated in cultural practices, religious practices, and caste systems. In preparation for the XV National Sociological Conference, 15 research committees with distinct theme and Subthemes have been established. It is with great honor that we invite you to attend this conference and present research papers to the Research Committees (RCs).
